The use of the safety netting in NZ as a fall arrest system is widespread even in the construction of the typical housing where wood is the most common element.

Not for nothing, New Zealand is one of the main countries in the world in the care of the protection for its workers. They are taking into very careful consideration the Safety at Height rules including the safety standards issued by themselves or, in the case of the safety netting, from the European Standard EN1263.1:2014, although they are performing some tests to realistically adjust the latter to their construction works and in a future development of their own standard.
